Where hasn't COVID-19 had an impact on the practice of employment law?

As part of Above the Law's COVID-19 special coverage, Labor & Employment Law Daily attorney experts Wayne D. Garris, Jr., Kathleen Kapusta, Lisa A. Milam, Ronald Miller, Joy P. Waltemath, and Pamela Wolf took turns at responding to the issues confronting employment law practitioners, from the initial onslaught of the virus, through shelter-in-place, return to work, and traditional labor considerations.

For the convenience of our Labor & Employment Law Daily subscribers, we have linked to the four articles below:

- Tracking COVID-19's Employment Law Impact: Difficult at Best, Contradictory at Worst.
  "Practitioners have told us they don't have time to sleep, there's no such thing as a weekend, and that if they write something in the morning, it's out of date by the afternoon."
- Tracking COVID-19's Employment Law Impact: The Sheltering-In-Place Factor
  "There is the fear of the virus — and the fear of liability."
- Tracking COVID-19's Employment Law Impact: Compliance Concerns in the Return-to-Work Process
  "Crises like the COVID-19 pandemic can bring out the best and worst in people."
- Tracking COVID-19's Employment Law Impact: The Role of Traditional Labor
  "The overarching dynamic has been cooperation, perhaps in keeping with the 'we're all in this together' mindset that marked the early days of the pandemic."